

Praise for K.M. Kaung's Wolf: A Novel of Love and Betrayal

- * You have such a unique voice, eye and heart. I'm so proud of you for enduring so much without giving ground to stupidities and banalities. . . . I love the idea of telling Burma's story through a fugitive student leader. That's perfect. It works. It allows you to tackle the personal and political at once, and you do so very well. . . . You are an exceptionally gifted writer. I can feel and taste Burma's struggle through your words. I feel the beauty, and the violation, the flowers and the stench, the dignity and the brutality. Not at all an easy picture to share. That you can move your spirit through so much pain is no small achievement.

- * Wolf tells the story of Mothi Awegoke, a student leader in the 1988 pro-democracy uprising in Burma, who's on the run from military intelligence agents looking to shut him down permanently. Friends and lovers come to his aid, though not always for the right reasons. A political suspense novel with a touch of noir, the story is enriched with details about the Burmese culture. The novel marks a promising debut for author Kyi May Kaung.
